II. 6. a. intr. To be pleased, to like; to have the will or desire; to have the humour; to think proper. (In sense, exactly = the passive in 4, 4 b.)

The history of this inverted use of please (observed first in Scottish writers) is obscure. But exactly the same change took place in the 14th c. in the use of the synonymous verb LIKE, where the impersonal 'it liked him', 'him liked', became 'he liked' c 1430. It may therefore be assumed that 'I please' was similarly substituted for 'it pleases me', 'me pleases' (c 1440 in 3c). Cf. also Malory's 'me ought', in alliterative Morte Arthure 'me aughte', with Wyclif's 'Y awȝte', later 'I ought'. The remarkable thing in the case of please is that the sense was already logically expressed by the passive to be pleased (sense 4), and that the new idiom was therefore not needed, 'he pleases' being simply = 'it pleases him', and 'he is pleased'. Shakspere uses the three forms indifferently. Indeed, all the constructions of the vb., exc. 6c, are richly exemplified in his works: see Schmidt.

b. if (†and, an) you please: if it please you, if you like, if it is your will or pleasure: a courteous qualification to a request, the acceptance of an offer, etc.; also (parenthetically), a sarcastic way of emphasizing any surprising statement, as if asking leave to make it. (So F. s'il vous plaît. Cf. by your leave: see LEAVE sb.[1] 1.)

Here you may have been originally dative, as in 3 b (i.e. if (it) please you, = L. si vobis placet, F. s'il vous plaît, Ger. wenn es Ihnen gefällt), as in quot. 1483 in 2; but it is now taken as nominative (i.e. if you are pleased, if you like, if it is your will or pleasure): cf. if he pleases; if they please, above (in 6); and 'if ye please' here in 1530. Shakspere has both if you be pleased (4 b), and if you please.

c. please! (imperative or optative) was app. originally short for please you (3 c) = 'may it (or let it) please you'; but it is now usually taken as = 'Be pleased' (imperative of 6), or as short for 'if you please' (6 b).

This use of please appears to have been unknown to Shakspere, whose shortest form is please you (3 c).

When parenthetical, or without construction, please is = may it please you, if it please you, if you please; e.g. Please, may I go out? May I come in, please? Come here, please; Give me my hat, please; Please, Sir, did you call? Shall I ring the bell? Yes, please. Will you, please, take a message for me?

But when followed by an infinitive, it is = Be pleased: e.g. Please to excuse my keeping you waiting; Please to return the book soon; Please not to lose it.

2. In modern politics, A direct vote of the whole of the electors of a state to decide a question of public importance, e.g. a proposed change in the constitution, or the ratification or rejection of a measure approved by the legislature (see REFERENDUM); also by extension, a public expression, with or without binding force, of the wishes or opinion of a community.

In French, applied by Voltaire, 1776, to such a vote as used in some of the Swiss cantons (Littré); in the First French Republic used in connexion with the coup d'état of 18th Brumaire (9 Nov. 1799) and other acts, including that by which the consulate and imperial power were conferred on Napoleon I; in 1852 applied to the ratification of the coup d'état of Dec. 1851, and conferring of the imperial crown upon Napoleon III. It was in connexion with the last of these that the word became familiar in English.

plectonemic (plɛktəʊ'ni:mɪk), a. Biol. [f. Gr. πλεκτός twisted + νῆμα thread + -IC.] Of, pertaining to, or designating two or more like helices coiled together side by side in such a way that they cannot be fully separated unless they are unwound. Opp. PARANEMIC a.

1941 A. H. SPARROW et al. in Canad. Jrnl. Res. C. XIX. 325 Kuwada..describes two types of double-stranded spirals: (1) orthospirals, which are formed when the two threads being coiled have one end free so that internal twisting does not occur; (2) anorthospirals, which result when two strands with both ends fixed are coiled together and in consequence have a twist compensating for each gyre of the spiral... Orthospirals are interlocked and cannot be separated without untwisting; anorthospirals are independent and can readily be pulled apart or fitted into each other... The term 'paranemic' (para = beside) instead of anorthospiral will be used here since it is simpler and its implications are clear. Instead of orthospiral 'plectonemic' (plektos = twisted) will be used as this has the advantage of indicating the relationship of the strands. 1950 [see PARANEMIC a.]. 1953 WATSON & CRICK in Cold Spring Harbor Symp. Quant. Biol. XVIII. 129/2 We therefore believe that if a helical structure is present [in DNA], the relationship between the helices will be plectonemic. 1971 Nature 22 Jan. 241/1 Tropocollagen..consists of three protein chains with similar, specific and very characteristic amino-acid compositions, twisted into a plectonemic triple helix of about 100 turns. 1974 [see PARANEMIC a.].

Hence plecto'nemically adv.

1953 *Cold Spring Harbor Symp. Astron. In pl., A close group or cluster of small stars in the constellation Taurus, commonly spoken of as seven, though only six are visible to the average naked eye. (Good eyes on a clear night can make out about nine, while the telescope shows a great number.)

According to Greek Mythology, the Pleiades were the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione, the eldest of whom, Electra, was 'the lost Pleiad', and not represented by a star. The seven names, with those of the parents, have since Ricciolo (1665) been individually applied to the nine brightest stars; of these Alcyone is of the third magnitude, Electra and Atlas of the fourth, Merope, Maia, and Taygete of the fifth, Pleione, Celeno, and Asterope, between the sixth and the seventh. Some think that the name was actually derived from πλεῖν to sail, because the season of navigation began with their heliacal rising.

1782 C. BURNEY Gen. Hist. Mus. II. iii. 188 Few of the musical terms in the tract of Franco, are more difficult to comprehend or define than the word Plica, which he calls 'a note of division of the same sound, ascending or descending.' 1801 T. BUSBY Dict. Mus. s.v., Plica, the name formerly given to a kind of ligature used in the old music as a sign of hesitation, or pausing. 1881 GROVE Dict. Mus. III. 4/1 Plica ..a character, mentioned by Franco of Cologne, Joannes de Muris, and other early writers, whose accounts of it are not always very easily reconciled to each other. Franco describes four kinds... Joannes de Muris describes the Plica as a sign of augmentation, similar in effect to the Point. Franco tells us that it may be added at will to the Long, or the Breve; but to the semibreve only when it appears in Ligature. Some other writers apply the term 'Plica' to the tail of a Large, or Long. The Descending Plica is sometimes identified with the Cephalicus. 1903 C. F. A. WILLIAMS Story of Notation vi. 101 In the sixth chapter Franco treats of the Plica. 1940 G. REESE Music in Middle Ages (1941) III. x. 283 Another type of ornament was notated by the plica. This was attached to either single notes..or ligatures... When it was applied to single notes, usually two parallel strokes of unequal length were added to the note-head. These strokes, enfolding the head, gave the plica its name. 1942 W. APEL Notation of Polyphonic Music, 900-1600 (1944) III. iii. 234 The plica is a passing tone which is indicated..by a downward or upward dash attached to the right of a note. In modal notation, the plica appears preferably in connection with ligatures. Ibid. 235 We shall carefully distinguish between plica-note and plica-tone. The former term refers to the written note to which the plica-dash is attached; the latter to the extra tone called for by the dash. 1954 New Oxf. Hist. Music II. 325 The plica.. is a short stroke which modifies the single square note, leading either upwards or downwards. Ibid., The instructions of the medieval theorists most often quoted are those of the Anonymus of Paris, who in his Quædam de arte discantandi tells us that 'it should be formed in the throat with the epiglottis', and of Lambert, who wrote under the pen-name of Aristotle: 'The plica is made in the voice by compressing the epiglottis, combining it neatly with a repercussion of the voice.' Ibid., The second, semi-vocal, note of the plica is not an ad libitum ornament..but has a time-value of its own, one-third or one-half of that which would belong to the parent note if it were not plicated. 1957 C. PARRISH Notation of Medieval Music (1958) v. 130 Plicas are used sparingly. 1979 Early Music Apr. 189/1 The plica is a note with stems on both sides of the note head and is meant to be sung as two pitches, the first one specified by the position of the note head, the second one unspecified, but lying above or below the first note, depending on the direction of the stems.

The β forms are taken over from PLIGHT *sb.*¹; when that word was (in some parts of England, already in 14th c.) reduced to plīt, plīte, and thus indentified in pronunciation and sometimes in spelling with this, this began in turn to be spelt plyght, plight, which superseded plite in 16th c. This spelling appears first in branch II, and perh. there was association of sense, peril (PLIGHT *sb.*¹ 1) being a kind of 'evil plight' (4 b below). In 16–17th c. the gh was often extended to the synonym PLAIT, written pleight, plaight (but for this there were also other possible models in eight, weight, straight, riming with plait, wait).]

plough, plow (plaʊ), sb.[1] Forms: see below. [Late OE. plóh (plóg), = ON. plógr (in Rígsmál 10–11th c.); so Sw. plog, Da ploug, plov; in OFris. plōch (EFris. plōg, NFris. pluwge), MLG. plōch, plūch, MDu. ploech (Du. ploeg), OHG. pfluog (MHG. pfluoc, Ger. pflug):—Teut. type plôgo-* or plôho-*, whence also Lombard Lat. plo(v)um, -us (Du Cange), Lomb. piò, Tirol. plof plough. The regular OE. inflexion of plóh would have dat. plogе, gen. plogеs, nom. pl. plogas, giving in early ME. ploh, plogе, plogеs, later plouh, plowh, plowgh, pl. plowes; whence, by form-levelling, plough, ploughs, or plow, plows; the former the accepted spelling in England since 1700, the latter usual in U.S. In pronunciation, the final guttural was lost in some districts in 14th c., and has quite disappeared not only in the standard language, but in all dialects south of the Peak of Derbyshire; it remains in Scotland as (x) (pleuch, pluich = (pløx, plʏx)), and in the north of England is represented by f (pleuf, plewf, pluif, pluf, pleaf, plif, etc.: see Eng. Dial. Dict. s.v.). In PLOUGH v. (q.v.) neither gh nor f is pronounced.

As with path, penny, and other early p-words in Teutonic, the origin of plóg, plóh, is involved in obscurity. Apparently the word was of late appearance. It is not found in Gothic, which used hôha, nor in OE. which used sulh, still retained dialectally, esp. in s.w., where plough is not used in this sense: see SULL sb., and cf. Eng. Dial. Dict. In Norse, also, the earlier name appears to have been arðr, cognate with OS. erida, f. vbl. root ar- to till, plough (see EAR v.), which survives in Norwegian as ar a small plough, perh. an earlier and simpler implement than the plógr. The name is also found in Lith. pliugas, and in the Slavonic langs. generally, OSlav., Serv., Russ. plugъ, Pol. plug, Boh. pluh; but is there admittedly from German.]

B. Signification.

1. a. An agricultural implement, used to prepare the soil for sowing or planting, by cutting furrows in it, and turning it up, so as to expose a fresh surface to the action of the air. Often used as the symbol of agriculture, esp. in such expressions as to be at the plough, to follow or hold the plough.

It consists essentially of a cutting blade (in primitive types a pointed stick) fixed in a frame drawn by oxen or horses (or in recent times by mechanical power, as steam), and guided by a man.

plough-land, plow-land ('plaʊlænd). [f. PLOUGH *sb.*¹ + LAND *sb.*¹: cf. OE. sullung, a derivative of sulh plough, used in a similar sense in Kent and elsewhere. For the form, cf. ON. plógs-land (= plough's land), Sw. plogland an acre; and, in sense 2, Du. ploegland, Ger. pflugland.]

1. Hist. The name used in the northern and eastern counties of England, after the Norman Conquest, for the unit of assessment of land, based upon the area capable of being tilled by one plough-team of eight oxen in the year: corresponding to the HIDE of the south and south-west (with which it was often equated), and, like it, embracing originally the meadow and pasture-land, and other necessary appurtenances of the holding.

In Domesday Bk. and other records in Latin, this unit is expressed by carrucata (= AF. carue, ONF. caruee, F. charuée, CARUCATE) a derivative of carruca plough, while the hide is rendered hida. It is not possible to say whether 'plough-land' was a translation of carrucata or the converse; but we have no instance of the word before the end of the 13th c., and plough itself appears first in the 12th. The fact that the counties in which the carrucata was the unit of assessment are precisely those in which Danish influence prevailed, favours the theory that the plough-land was of Norse origin; but there are difficulties. ON. plógs-land meant an acre, the normal area ploughed in one day. The extent of the normal plough-land, like that of the hide, is usually given as 120 acres; but in numerous instances it fell short of or exceeded this; the variations being prob. due to attempts to make the areal plough-lands correspond with the traditional assessment of the manors, to the inclusion or exclusion of the appurtenances and fallow land, and to local differences in the size of the acre.

The plough-land was divided into 8 ox-gangs, as against the 4 yard-lands or virgates of the hide.

The connexion with rain expressed in the various names has been variously explained. Belon, 1555, said the birds were so called because most easily taken in rainy weather, which modern observation contradicts. Others, because they arrive in flocks in the rainy season (Littré); according to Prof. Newton, the Golden and Grey Plovers arrive on the shores of the Mediterranean at the approach of winter. Others, because of the restlessness of the bird when rain is approaching: see R. Lubbock Fauna of Norfolk (1845) 61–2. Others have attributed it to the appearance of the upper plumage, as if spotted with rain-drops.]

America to three birds of the Scolopacidæ or Snipe family, the Bartramian Sandpiper, Bartramia longicauda, and the Greater and Lesser Yellowshank, Totanus melanoleucus and flavipes.

These words are thought by some to be derived from a popular L. piluccāre*, inferred from It. piluccare to pluck (hair, feathers, grapes), Pr. pelucar to pluck (a fowl). OF. peluchier (Marie de France, c 1180), ONF. pelukier, plusquier, mod.Norm. and Picard pluquer to pick, clean, peck, Walloon ploki to pick (grain); also with ex-, Romansch spluccar to pluck out, F. éplucher to pick, sift; all from a popular L. sb. pilucca* tuft of hair, deriv. of pilus hair, widely represented in the Romanic languages: see PLUSH, PERUKE. (See Diez, Körting, s.v. piluccare, Kluge s.v. pflücken)

It has been suggested that the late L. or Romanic word was taken into Low German in connexion with the trade in down and feathers on the coasts of the North Sea; but, in spite of the close similarity of form and sense, there are chronological, historical, and phonetic difficultics, which are increased by the entire lack of evidence of the occurrence of either the Teutonic or the Romanic word before the 10th c. Cf. Franck s.v. plukken.]

It is natural or artificial: the first is Lead Ore or that mixed with silver. The artificial is a kind of Litharge, that sticks to the bottom of the Furnace [etc.].

2. Min. Black lead or graphite; one of the allotropic forms of carbon: used for pencils, also, mixed with clay, for making crucibles; and for many other purposes.

'Black lead' is the popular, and 'graphite' the strictly scientific name; but the term 'plumbago' is largely used in the arts, esp. in mining.

1784 KIRWAN Elem. Min. 158 Plumbago, Reissbley .. Blyertz of the Swedes... In a strong heat and open fire it is wholly volatile. 1786 tr. Scheele's Chem. Ess. 243 The black lead or plumbago which is generally known in commerce, is very different from molybdæna. Ibid. 250 Hence I am convinced, that plumbago is a kind of mineral sulphur or charcoal; the constituent parts of which are aerial acid and a considerable quantity of phlogiston. 1788 Cronstedt's Min. (ed. 2) II. 451 Black lead or plumbago is a fossil substance extremely black. 1795 PEARSON in Phil. Trons. LXXXV. 335 The black matter was therefore a compound of iron and carbon, or, as some chemists term it, plumbago; and which in the new system is denominated a carburet of iron. 1796 KIRWAN Elem. Min. (ed. 2) II. 58 Plumbago. Graphite of Werner .. carbon combined with one tenth or one eighth of its weight of malleable iron. 1799 —— Geol. Ess. 191 Probably because the iron .. had absorbed too great a quantity of carbon, and was thus converted into plombago. 1808 HENRY Epit. Chem. (ed. 5) 242 Another combination of iron and carbon, which is a true carburet of iron, is the substance called plumbago, or black-lead, used in fabricating pencils, and in covering iron to prevent rust. [So 1815 (ed. 7) II. 120.] 1843 HUMBLE Dict. Geol. (ed. 2) 32/1 Anthracite resembles and appears to pass into plumbago. 1846 MCCULLOCH *Acc. Brit. The mines in this place have been wrought since the days of Queen Elizabeth, and furnish the very best material hitherto discovered for making pencils. 1869 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. (1871) 82 Graphite, or Plumbago, crystallizes in six-sided plates.

3. Bot. A genus of herbaceous plants, inhabiting Southern Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, having spikes of subsessile flowers, with a tubular five-parted calyx; leadwort: so called from the colour of the flowers. [Pliny's name (rendering Gr. Μολύβδαινα), adopted as generic name by Tournefort, 1700.] Also attrib.

[1601 HOLLAND Pliny II. 336 There groweth commonly an herbe named in Greeke Molybdæna, that is to say in Latine, Plumbago, euen vpon euery corne land.] 1747 WESLEY *Prim. CHALMERS Tiyo Soga vi. 53 He distributed twigs from the plumbago plant to be worn round the neck. 1903 Contemp. Rev. Mar. 346 Pale blue plumbagos, yellow canariensis.

[Note. In Dioscorides, μολύβδαινα, f. μόλυβδος lead, was applied to a mineral substance (v. 97, 100), and a plant. The former was yellow oxide of lead (PbO), esp. the litharge produced in the extraction of gold and silver from ores containing lead. By Pliny this is latinized as molybdæna, also once (xxxiv. 18. 50) by plumbōgo, which, as well as golēna, were applied by him to the yellow oxide, but prob. included as an inferior variety the sulphide (PbS), called by Dioscorides μολυβδοειδὴς λίθος, 'lead-like stone', the modern GALENA. For the plant Pliny always uses plumbago. In the French transl. (1572) of Matthioli's Commentary on Dioscorides, μολύβδαινα = plumbogo is rendered plombagine, in It. piomboggine, and is stated to be identical with litharge; but other ores may have been included. Thence the explanations of the word in Cotgrave and other English writers down to Bailey: see PLUMBAGINE, and sense 1 above. In Holland's Pliny, plumbogo is rendered litharge. In the 16th c., to Agricola and others in Germany practically interested in mining, plumbogo mainly meant the sulphide of lead, but also included other substances similar to this in appearance, and in the property of staining the fingers and marking paper, esp. the native sulphides of antimony and molybdenum, STIBNITE (Sb_2S_3) and MOLYBDENITE (MoS_2), and the mineral graphite. In 1567 Christoph. Enkel (Encelius) of Saalfeld, while identifying Pliny's molybdæno, golēno, and plumbāgo, distinguished the 'productive' species (i.e. the oxide and sulphide of lead) from the 'barren' (sterilis), which yielded no lead, and was mainly graphite; the latter was described by Ferrante Imperato in 1599 as employed in the grofio piombino, 'leaden pencil'. In 1779 Scheele found that certain samples of the 'barren' plumbago, on being burnt, were dissipated into carbonic acid gas, and that in fact they consisted of carbon: see quot. 1786 in sense 2. In 1789 Werner and Karsten proposed the name GRAPHITE instead of the ambiguous 'plumbago'. But its composition was still disputed. An analysis, made by French chemists in 1786, had given, after volatilization, a residue of iron, and plumbago was pronounced a carburet of iron (see quot. 1795). This view prevailed until Karsten in 1826 and Sefström in 1829 proved that the iron was only an impurity in the specimens analysed, and that graphite or plumbago was, as Scheele had said in 1779, really a mineral form of carbon. (See paper by Dr. John W. Evans, F.G.S., in Trons. Phil. Soc. 1907.)]

plump (plʌmp), v.[1] [A Common LG. verb. = MLG., LG. plumpen, MDu., Du. plompen to fall or plunge into water with the characteristic sound, EFris. plumpen to make a hollow sound as water when anything falls into it, to fall with such a sound; thence, Ger. plumpen to fall plump or abruptly, also to beat water with a heavy stick, Da. plumpe to plunge, Sw. plumpa to plump, to fall with impact. Prob. of echoic origin, expressing a sound and action akin to those of PLOP v., but with more distinct expression of the liquid 'gulp' made by water when a body falls into it.

Cf. numerous more or less echoic or onomatopœic words in -ump, as bump, dump, mump, stump, thump, tump. Some have compared L. plumbāre to cover with lead, later prob. to throw the lead-line, whence It. piombare, Pr. plombar to plunge (see PLUMB v., PLUNGE v.); but the approach of form between plombar and the LG. plump-, plomp- group seems merely fortuitous.]

plus (plʌs). [a. L. plūs more. As in the case of MINUS (q.v.), the quasi-prepositional sense 1 did not exist in Latin, but the words plus and minus were used by Leonardo of Pisa in 1202 for the excess and deficiency in the results of two suppositions in the Rule of Double Position.

The signs + and − are used, app. as well-known signs, in the Behende und hübsche Rechnung auf allen Kauffmannschafft of Joh. Widmann 1489 (and subseq. edd. to 1526); but while he refers to the latter as minus, the former is said to stand for mer (i.e. mehr) 'was − ist, das ist minus, und das + ist das mer'. So far as yet collected, English examples of plus do not occur so early as those of minus.

As to the origin of the symbol +, various conjectures have been made; perhaps the most likely is that it originated in the MS. abbreviation of the L. et 'and' (which Leonardo always uses in his additions). Cantor Vorlesungen über Geschichte der Mathematik (1899) II. 230–1, from which these facts are mainly taken, cites, from mathematical MSS. of the beginning of the 15th c., and a non-mathematical MS. of the beginning of the 14th, a form of & = et which might easily pass into +.]

1930 N.Y. Times 26 Mar. 10/3 'Pluto' is the provisional name that Italian astronomers have given to the new trans-Neptune planet discovered March 13 at Lowell Observatory in Flagstaff, Ariz... Hugh Rice..yesterday opposed naming the newly discovered planet 'Minerva', as has already been suggested, because an asteroid already bears that name. 1930 V. M. SLIPHER Lowell Observatory Observation Circular 1 May, Many names have been suggested and among them Minerva and Pluto have been very popular... Pluto seems very appropriate and we are proposing to the American Astronomical Society and to the Royal Astronomical Society, that this name be given to it. As far as we know Pluto was first suggested by Miss Venetia Burney, aged 11, of Oxford, England. [Note] Kindly cabled by Prof. H. H. Turner. 1930 H. H. TURNER in Times 28 May 17/5 A post-card from the President of the Royal Astronomical Society offered this morning 'congratulations to the suggester of the name Pluto, now adopted'. The reference is to a telegram which I had the honour of sending to the Lowell Observatory on March 15..conveying the suggestion of Miss Venetia Burney, of Oxford, made at breakfast on that day to her grandfather, who sent it on to me... It was a brother of that same grandfather who suggested the names Deimos and Phobos for the satellites of Mars. 1933 D. L. SAYERS Hangman's Holiday 120 Presently they had guessed among other things Miss Tomkin's mother's photograph,..the new planet Pluto,..and had failed to guess the Prime Minister's wireless speech. 1939 SKILLING & RICHARDSON Astron. i. 12 The length of seasons depends, of course, upon the length of time required for the Davidson Astron. for Everyman iv. 203 Pluto's path never crosses Neptune's..for its orbit-plane is inclined 17° to the ecliptic plane. 1972 P. L. BROWN Astron. in Color ii. 86 One theory accounts for the origin of Pluto by considering that it is an ex-satellite of Neptune which somehow broke free. 1976 J. GRIBBIN Astron. for Amateur v. 70 Because of its elliptical orbit Pluto sometimes passes within the orbit of Neptune, and just now (until the end of this century) Neptune is the furthest planet from the Sun.

pn-, an initial combination occurring only in words from Greek; the p is usually mute in English.

(The p is pronounced in French, Spanish, Italian, German, Dutch, and other European langs.; also by Englishmen in reading Greek. It is to be desired that it were sounded in English also, at least in scientific and learned words; since the reduction of pneo- to neo-, pneu- to new-, and pnyx to nix, is a loss to etymology and intelligibility, and a weakening of the resources of the language.)

pneo- (pni:əʊ, ni:əʊ), combining element from Gr. πνέ-ειν, πνεῖν to blow, breathe, used in a few rare scientific terms.

With the neglect of the doctrine of supernatural beings, due to the philosophical tendencies of the 18th century, pneumatology came to deal with human souls only, and to mean:

b. The science of the nature and functions of the human soul or mind, now commonly called PSYCHOLOGY.

1785 REID Intell. Powers Pref. (1803) 9 There are two great branches of philosophy, one relating to body, the other to mind... podzol ('pɒdzɒl). Soil Sci. Also podsol, and formerly also with capital initial. [a. Russ. podzól, f. pod- under- + zolá ash.] An acidic, generally infertile soil which is characterized by a well-marked white or grey ash-like subsurface layer from which minerals have been leached into a lower dark-coloured layer, and which occurs esp. under coniferous trees or heath vegetation in moist, usu. temperate climates (typically in parts of N. poetry ('pəʊɪtrɪ). Forms: 4-7 poetrie, 5 -trye, -terye, 6 Sc. poyetrie, 5- poetry. [ME. = OF. poetrie, poeterie (13-14th c.), old It. poetría (Florio); ad. late and med.L. poetrīa, f. poëta poet.

Poetria occurs in a scholium on Horace Epist. II. i. 103, written (according to O. Keller, Pseudacro) c 650, perh. in North Italy, and preserved in MSS. of 10th c.; also in 9th or 10th c. MSS. of Martianus Capella. It is used as the title of treatises on the art of poetry, esp. the Nova Poetria of Gaufrei de Vinsauf (Galfridus de Vino Salvo, also called Galfridus Anglicus) about or soon after 1200; and in various works of the 13th c., as the Græcismus of Eberhardus Bethuniensis c 1212 ('Arte poetria fungor dum fingo poema'), the translation of Averroes' paraphrase of Aristotle's Poetics by Hermannus Alemannus c 1260, and the Catholicon of Joannes de Janua, 1286 ('a poeta, poeticus, et hæc poetria ars poetica'). (I. Bywater.) The relation of the word to L. poëtrio, Gr. ποιήτρια, poetess, is not clear; but, from its antiquity, its formative suffix cannot be identified with F. -erie, Eng. -ery, -ry, in such words as chirurgery, drollery, bigotry, mimicry. Our earliest English examples are from Chaucer, to whom the Nova Poetrio of Galfridus was well known, as he makes the Nun's Priest refer to it in his Tale (l. 527) and apostrophize the author as 'O Gaufred deere Maister soueravn'.]

3. W. MACKAIL (Communicated), In general, the essence of poetry as an art is not so much that it is rhythmical (which all elevated language is), or that it is metrical (which not all poetry is, except by a considerable extension of the meaning of the word), as that it is patterned language. This is its specific quality as a 'fine art'. The essence of 'pattern' (in its technical use, as applied to the arts) as distinct from 'composition' generally, is that it is composition which has what is technically called a 'repeat'; and it is the 'repeat' which technically differentiates poetry from non-poetry, both being (as arts) 'composition'. The 'repeat' may be obvious, as in the case of rhymed lines of equal length, or it may be more implicit, to any degree of subtlety; but if it does not exist, there is technically no poetry. The artistic power of the pattern-designer is shown in the way he deals with the problem of 'repeat'; and this is true of poetry likewise, and is probably the key (so far as one exists) to any technical definition or discussion of the art.

VI. From 16th c. F. point = 15–16th c. It. punto; derived from the sense prick, through that of stitch, work done with stitches with the needle.

As English used the native word stitch (OE. stice, from OTeut. stikan* to prick, stab, etc.) for the prick of the needle in sewing, the corresponding Fr. use of point was not adopted, and the development of this sense was entirely in Italian and French. The It. name punto in aria occurs at Venice in 1476.

It has been conjectured that point-blank represents a F. point blanc* meaning the white point or white spot on the target, but no such use is found in Fr., or in any Romanic lang. The phrase appears exclusively of English origin and use; and there is no evidence that in Eng. the 'blank' or 'white' was ever called the point blank. The probability therefore is that blank is here the sb. (BLANK sb. 2), and point the vb. (POINT v.[1] 12 a), referring to the pointing of the arrow or gun at the 'blank' or 'white'; point-blank being a combination of the same class as break-neck, cut-throat, save-all, stop-gap, etc. It may have started as an adj., in point-blank shot, distance, reach, or range, i.e. that in which one points or aims at the blank or white spot.]

This is a mistake; for the ball immediately falls from the axis of the gun, the tangent of the curve described, though but insensibly for a short time; but the line in which gunners take sight is usually contrived to make a small angle with the axis, so that..the ball will rise above the line of sights, and then, by the force of gravity, be made to fall again into it, at the place called the point-blank shot. 1818 HAZLITT *Eng. [Orig. in ME. phrase at point devis, at poynt devys, app. representing an OF. or AF. phrase à point devis*, not actually cited in Old French, which had however both the advb. phrase à point 'to point, to the point aimed at, to the proper or utmost point or degree, to the point of perfection', and the word devis, as ppl. adj. 'devised, arranged', and as sb. 'a device, arrangement, will, wish, desire'. The construction in à point devis requires the adj. sense, so that the phrase may be construed either 'to (the) point arranged', or, as devis à point, 'arranged to a proper point or degree, arranged properly or to perfection'. The latter appears to M. Paul Meyer the better construction of the words.
